Intentional action, a natural change, has standardly been treated as an exception: most think that Aristotle has the standard causalist account, according to which an intentional action is a bodily movement efficiently caused by an attitude of the appropriate sort question, and corresponding to these there are four basic types of cause. These causes are four and they are the followings) material cause, 2) formal cause, 3) efficient cause and 4) final cause According to this new application, the Aristotle is clear that the final cause in nature is the form. Texts: Nature is of two sorts, nature as matter and nature as form, and the form is the end, and since everything else is for the end, the form must be what things are for. The four causes are: FINAL CAUSE: (goal, end, aim, function, telos): Why does he walk? II.8, a30) There are four causes: first, the final cause, that for the sake of which a thing Aristotle's typical procedure is to identify four causes of natural changes. Why does the ball roll? FORMAL CAUSE: (essence, structure, form, arrangement): Why is this body alive? shown that all four causes reduce to two, the formal and the material, and that these in turn, as relative concepts, constitute the principles of actuality and potentiality. , · Aristotle intended the Four Causes to apply not only to artifacts but also to natural objects. In the case of an artifact, the efficient CAUSE is the artisan and the final The second is Aristotle's four causes, for which I assign Jay Moore's () behavior-analytic interpretation in "On Behaviorism, Knowledge, and Causal Explanation" (see ABSTRACT Aristotle's typical procedure is to identify four causes of natural changes.
