"Oxford Medieval Texts: Gesta Stephani" published on by Oxford University Press Gesta Stephani (c) There is strong evidence that the chronicle known as Gesta Stephani was written by Robert of Lewes, Bishop of Bath (). It is first recorded when it was first printed, by André Duchesne in, in a volume which contained also the Ecclesiastical History of Orderic Vitalis Gesta Stephani (c) There is strong evidence that the chronicle known as Gesta Stephani was written by Robert of Lewes, Bishop of Bath (). However, most of its information is in strict agreement with Malmesbury, who supported Gesta Stephani: The Deeds of Stephen. He was close to Henry of Blois, Bishop of Winchester and brother of King Stephen, and the work takes a strongly pro-Stephen line over the civil war with the forces of the Empress Matilda The Gesta Stephani also gives detailed information about many individual noblemen who were involved with the conflict between Stephen and Maud. It is a text that has had an adventurous history. He was For instance, the Gesta Stephani Regis accounts for the failure of Stephen's followers to keep oaths sworn to her on the grounds that they were extorted by a woman, who "did Henry of Huntingdon, and so is the Gesta Stephani. The Gesta Stephani indeed gives a distinct impression that Ranulf had not been Geoffrey de Mandeville, ppThe Gesta Stephani, regis Anglorum, et ducis Normannorum, incerto auctore, sed contemporaneo, olim: Sewell, Richard Clarke, Free Download, Borrow, and Streaming: Internet Archive This is the Gesta Stephani. The chronicle of Richard of Hexam is extremely short, covering the years The Gesta Stephani was written by an ecclesiastic and who was a partisan of Stephen.
