Also known as projective identification, this can be seen as the 1, · Transference is understood in psychoanalysis as the transfer of feelings, attitudes, thoughts, desires, fantasies, or behaviors originally experienced in the past. I have chosen the term "collective" because this part of the unconscious is not individual but universal; in contrast to the personal psyche, it has contents and modes of behaviour that are more or less the same everywhere and in all individuals. In this type of countertransference, you - as the therapist - respond to the client as if they are someone from your past.
