Introduction

In New Jersey, traffic violations can be detected, and tickets can be issued automatically through automated enforcement systems, such as red-light cameras, speed cameras, and other monitoring technologies. Automated enforcement systems in New Jersey, including red-light and speed cameras, are strategically positioned at intersections and along highways to detect traffic violations. These systems are designed to capture infractions such as running a red light or speeding without requiring the physical presence of a police officer. Once a violation is detected, the system automatically issues a citation based on the collected evidence, which is then mailed to the registered owner of the vehicle. This technology aims to enhance enforcement efficiency and improve road safety. This automated approach aims to enhance road safety and enforce traffic laws more efficiently.
