It assumes that people in society have opposing goals er's interpretive sociology requires the understanding of motives, affectual states, and actions. Along with other students of er (Raymond Aron, Dennis Wrong) we will shift value-rational to the level of a genus, of which the other three are species. The erian statements are shown to be compatible with a conception of the human individual as a being who interprets subjective experiences in terms of action consonant with logic, rational calculation, instrumental assessment, sometimes translated as "technocratic thinking". The first three—traditional, affective, means-ends rational This is also known as the conflict view of power. These are understandable because they themselves represent or embody interpretations. The elements of Max er's general sociology, including the theory of stratification, are designed to amplify and confirm the methodology elaborated in the first part of his major er's sociology Many generations of sociologists have been raised in the belief that Max er was a seminal founder of the discipline because he established a clear scientific According to er, power is a zero sum game. "Power refers to the chance of an individual or a group to realise its will through communal action even in the face of resistance by others."
