To each, but whoso did receive of them, And taste, to him the gushing of the wave 'The Lotos-eaters' delves into the mesmerizing effects of the lotos plants on Odysseus's men, as they become enchanted by an otherworldly land. Branches they bore of that enchanted stem, Laden with flower and fruit, whereof they gave. We will eat the Lotos, sweet As the yellow honeycomb, In the valley some, and some On the ancient heights divine; And no more roam, On the loud hoar foam, To the melancholy home At the limit of the brine, The little isle of Ithaca, beneath the day's line. The poem describes a group of sailors This poem is based on Homer's Odyssey, Chapter 9, which describes a visit by Ulysses and his men to the home of the Lotos-eaters (also "lotus") on their way home from the And round about the keel with faces pale, Dark faces pale against that rosy flame, The mild-eyed melancholy Lotos-eaters came.
